SALT LAKE CITY, Utah, July 12, 1869.

The Chicago excursionists, after a hot, dusty, and tedious ride across the Central Asiatic prairies, arrived at Cheyenne at 7 o'clock on the morning of the 4th. Cheyenne is the terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad, and is situated on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, at the foot of the Black Hills, on the Crow Creek, a tributary of the Platte River. It is 6,041 feet above the level of the sea, and is the highest point reached by the road. It is a town of about 4,000 inhabitants, and is the capital of Laramie County, Wyoming Territory. It is a thriving place, and has a number of fine brick buildings. The Union Pacific Railroad Company have their machine shops here, and employ a large number of men. The town is supplied with water from the Crow Creek, which is brought in pipes from the mountains. The water is cold and pure, and is a great luxury to the people, after drinking the warm, alkaline water of the plains. Cheyenne is the county seat of Laramie County, and contains the usual county buildings. It is a lively place, and has a number of saloons, gambling houses, and dance halls. Many of the inhabitants are engaged in the cattle trade, and large herds of cattle are to be seen grazing on the hills and plains in the vicinity of the town. The Chicago excursionists remained here about two hours, and then started on the last stage of their journey to the Pacific Coast.

The road from Cheyenne to Sherman, the highest point reached by the road, is a continuous ascent, and the grade is very heavy. The road passes through a rough, broken country, and the scenery is wild and picturesque. Numerous deer, antelope, and prairie dogs were seen during the day. The train stopped at Sherman for dinner, and the excursionists had an opportunity of viewing the surrounding country. Sherman is a small station, consisting of a few houses and a water tank. It is 8,247 feet above the level of the sea, and is the highest point reached by the road. The descent to the Pacific Coast commences here. The train left Sherman at 2 o'clock, and soon reached the summit of the Black Hills, which are a spur of the Rocky Mountains
